Aphro-ism and the dreaded comparison

Gardening mechanics:

- Measuring properties of soil, water level, light level, root space,

- How much space should players have, how many grids? Soil as limited space?

- Misting, cleaning leaves, canes, insects, pollination, pruning, pesticide ethics?

- Objectives, not accumulation

- Cooperation and sharing of info and resources so some outcomes are unique, mutually exclusive or only achievable thru sharing

Bounds of space, multiple buildings, personal private divide

- Squat marks and finding secret spaces

Why not just spam the number of characters you need? Why not just whatsapp?

- Third player validating speech?

- Limited speech options

- If all the options have consequences you can't just choose one based on lack of consequence

- What if you instead chose /tone/??

MVP: grid sharing and chain effects from other people's patches, personal expression n interactions

Energy value related to happiness related to aesthetic

Notes:

Exhausted by exploration and survival being about hunting and food and water and no one seeing that the reason this ends up with militarization is because bodies have social needs just as profound, that scarcity doesn't work that way. Agriculture not feeding into the games in useful or realistic ways etc. Everything is about forcing conflict thru a scarcity model that doesn't work. I want to explore places to find stuff and learn stuff then socialise with people doing shared tasks to build post scarcity community

exploration vs colonialism vs mining vs gardening

the light touch of waiting to see what interactions bw elements occur based on small adjustments

Ok so what if your energy bar was related to just flat out how many humans had interacted with you

And in this context energy bar means essentially how long you can resist the tug of lying in bed as well as how much exertion you can do outside it

So just like, when they push the buttons, which i feel like should be about what kinds of things would be good to do in the garden, and how they feel about its current state
